

Architectural Ghosts: Storytelling & the Architectural Imaginary

ZOE LYNNE COPE

'Architectural Ghosts' proposes architecture as a series of eleven speculative cities that function as characters engaged in a theatrical masque set in contemporary Rome, Italy.

A re-imagining of the novel Invisible Cities by Italo Calvino, this project utilizes narrative storytelling as architectural medium, method and site. The framework of the original novel was analyzed, collapsed and re-written in a contemporary context. The project offers a critique of the use of the novel in architectural education and challenges the marginalized role of women presented in both the original text and throughout much of architectural history.

Calvino used cities as metaphors for women conquered by powerful male explorers. In this project, each city was designed and illustrated relative to site, theme and the work of a prominent female storyteller, philosopher, or architect as a way to presence their ghosts. Much of the research was oriented around unearthing the accomplishments of women engaged in a partnership wherein a male counterpart received credit for much of the work. The plot is structured by an overarching conversation between a female narrator and a male character. Desire for what her voice brings into being creates a tension that drives the entirety of the plot, representation and sequencing of architectural experiences. Eventually, it is revealed that she herself is also a city; she too is a ghost catalyzed by architectural and phenomenological experiences that imply presence.

This project explores 'architectural ghosts' as allegory for the presence of the absence of presence that reveals architecture as performance. The universal gap between lived experience and representation is explored as primary function of the paradox of human desire. Literary narrative is utilized as structure for the gap of philosophical lack and as active agent for the discrete, conditional alignments that generate and inform productive encounters with the architectural imaginary. The masque, as performance between complex characters, reveals the individual and collective nature of architecture, cities and the stories we tell about both.

ARCHITECTURAL GHOSTS

A Masque for the Architectural Imaginary

'Architectural Ghosts' is a re-imagining of Italo Calvino's seminal work, Invisible Cities, as a proposal for eleven speculative cities that function as characters in an architectural masque deeply embedded in the historical and cultural imaginary of Rome, Italy.

1. L'Intizio / The Beginning

The Magmaker stands at the center of the city's third oldest bridge looking down at the river of ink that make across his scattered hands. The faded inkblots carve their traces across the landscape of flesh a lifetime reservoir of cities and times. In focus beyond his hands, the fiber rises uply glides through the night, glass also reflecting the eerie image of a sleeping city. The water slips underneath this image - evocative and alive.

The Magmaker tries not to believe all of the extraordinary tales that the Scepter weaves into his eyes. His voice conjures exotic, improbable places - cities of which no maps can be made - where architecture is spun from spider webs, clouds and dust. The entire city lies: vertigo of semantic confusion that he does not understand. The Magmaker tries not to believe everything that slips through his flesh and key him have with bones exposed and vulnerable in the night. Her absence lures him down the winding streets and across bridges to be sure, dispenses for her to explain more of those cities that he cannot seem to imagine calm. The thread of her voice carries a small and unyielding truth that he cannot seem to ignore. In the thickness of night such as this one, the Scepter's cities do not feel quite so far away.

In the countless nights, standing at the center of a bridge in the heart of Rome, looking down at the traces scattered into his hands, he finds his one, but now glittering cities looking back. These intertwined glass quickly rate the line between earth and sky and pry open the night. He is haunted here in a waking dream: her voice a breathing, neuronal gesture that does not leave, even when he closes his eyes.

MARION

The Hidden City - Via Margutta

The best place to hide is usually in plain sight. It is precisely the place where one has assumed that something should not be hidden, which ends up being the best place for it. This is the one place that no one is expecting to find that which is hidden or hiding.

The same is true for cities, despite the complexities involved. To reach the Hidden City, head south on the eastmost main road off of the Piazza del Popolo. There is an alleyway on your left entirely overgrown with foliage and vines. The passageway is tiny and charming. The architecture of secrecy is a delightfully colorful world pieced together out of fragments of crumbling plaster, faded, clipped window sills, thick curtains of vines, ivy-covered cobblestones, and the creeping sense that you should move and speak delicately here.

The vines are adorned with thin metal filaments that chime softly in the slow breeze. Not one of the doors along this street opens and the windows too, are sealed shut and covered with mirrors. The vibrant facade that stretches down this street is a mask for the Hidden City that weaves behind it. The residents of the Hidden City, if they are not, appear to float from one side of the path to another. Gentle phantoms who trail their fingers through the trellis, sway lightly with the chiming, as their faces in show, peculiar angles, they appear to vanish abruptly, slipping into the hidden air of the city beyond.

If you examine the trellis closely, you may notice the nodal apertures and tentacle scopes pecking through the vines. Each resident has their own, unique threshold into the skin of the city wall, and to access this portal each must perform a precise sequence of operations with the passageway, activating it through touches, phrases whispered into disguised receptors and glances into hidden cameras. This is not only key-off access in its sphererality. Visitors are not allowed to enter the Hidden City, the only way for you to experience her is through quick glimpses of the space beyond that open momentarily when residents come and go.

Just beyond the facade the wall space itself is a pliable, fleshy prosc containing all of the utilities and programs of the Hidden City. The walls and ceiling are continuous, sensually curving into each other, revealing inner spaces like voids of removed organs carved away. These spaces are programmed as in all cities: marketplace, library, community pool, food garden, office, and so on. Particular to the Hidden City is the intimate place of the excess folds of membrane, reserved for individuals who wish to pry open, crawl into, and inhabit the inner face of the threshold between inside and outside the city. The city skin can be stretched to accommodate new functions, if the need arises.

Bathed in a diffuse golden light transmitted from the sunsets in the trellis, the waxy surfaces of these chambers absorb and radiate a transfixing amber luminosity. Entirely porous, the spongiform walls filter, purify, and transmit air throughout the interior. The exterior of the Hidden City is covered in far both highly reflective and almost entirely translucent in the sunlight. As each fiber moves it generates energy for the City, storing it deep inside the membrane in a grid of follicle sacs. An independent network of pipes for the water supply and sewage are through this membrane as well, ensuring that the city will never be detected from the outside.

Extending beyond the fleshy communal space is the intricate system of circulation pathways for reaching the dwellings. In places, these circuit around and afford incredible panoramic views out over the countryside. In the Hidden City, each element has been designed such that it is kept out of every possible view from those outside. Apartments run along the shadows cast by neighboring antennas and mirrored glass screens reflect their surroundings so that people may walk their dogs unseen. The unsettling thing about the Hidden City is that there are pieces hiding even from itself, an intricate labyrinth of secrecy deep inside of another. This city within the city is built on top of a frequency wavelength shifter that subtly vibrates the buildings and it's inhabitants such that they can see each other because they are all vibrating at the same speed, but outsiders cannot see them. It is unknown how many citizens live here and unknown too, how many more cities are hiding inside of this, and each one subsequent to its increasing degrees of invisibility.

It is quite common to see people falling along along this street, especially those who have been evicted from the tranquil city. They can be seen historically grasping at the vines and screaming at the walls, desperately trying to enter though they never will.

The Hidden City keeps her secrets.
